Modulation of Neurotransmitter Metabolism: Exploring Metabolic Aspects of Alzheimer's Disease. A complex range of molecular changes are known to occur in Alzheimer's disease (AD). In the last decade, our understanding of the causes of AD has progressed considerably. It is evident from these studies that, although a genetic component is important, AD cannot be regarded simply as a genetic disease and its etiology is becoming more and more multi-factorial. For this reason, there is growing interest in non-genetic factors and the development of pharmacological strategies to modify any of the established mechanisms involved in the pathological changes associated with AD is under intense investigation. A number of compounds which target specific pathological mechanisms associated with AD have undergone clinical evaluation. Recently, interest has focussed on the modulation of neurotransmitter levels and neurotransmitter metabolism in AD. A number of approaches have been investigated in this regard with varying degrees of success. One approach involves increasing the activity of an enzyme associated with neurotransmitter metabolism, the enzyme monoamine oxidase type B (MAO-B). A number of compounds have been
