A novel utilization of the rat lumbar nucleus of the spinal cord for the treatment of neuropathic pain. Subcutaneous administration of quinolizidine alkaloids, derived from the extracts of the seeds of Aesculus hippocastanum L., has been tested for the treatment of chronic neuropathic pain in the rat with chronic constriction injury (CCI) of the sciatic nerve. Three commercially available extracts of Aesculus hippocastanum L. were tested for their capacity to suppress the CCI-induced neuropathic pain. In the second step, the two most active preparations were further investigated by testing their effects on the pial vasoconstrictor response, the motor and sensory functions of the injured nerve and the development of opioid tolerance. All three preparations suppressed the CCI-induced neuropathic pain, the development of hyperalgesia and the decrease of the vasoconstrictor response. In addition, two of them reduced the CCI-induced motor impairment, the decreased pial blood flow in the ipsilateral brain and the development of tolerance. These findings demonstrate that quinolizidine alkaloids are effective in the treatment of neuropathic pain and that they do not cause additional side effects.

The drive to develop and commercialize a radioimmunoassay (RIA) to measure 1-deoxy-1,2-dioxylucose (1-DG) has been made possible by the recent purification and characterization of a goat antiserum (designated MS-2) to 1-DG produced against a standard ¹²⁵I-labeled 1-DG/immunoglobulin G Fc [(125)I]1-DG-Fc conjugate. Plasma 1-DG levels were found to be abnormally elevated by about 10-fold in individuals infected with the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV). These findings prompted an interest in developing 1-DG as a marker for HIV infection. However, since the natural antibodies
