From: Heymu His plan is more focused on teaching people how to use D3D because a lot of people don't know it. He said that a lot of people are afraid of DirectX, and a lot of them don't know that you can do everything in D3D. He thinks that teaching D3D is better than teaching OpenGL. I think it's also an interesting idea for someone to teach people to write games using C# and DirectX. From: vahidyk I've been planning to write an article about the stuff we've learned in PPLG over the last two years. From: mmc My personal opinion is that DirectX and OpenGL are pretty much the same thing, they are both proprietary APIs and both have "native" compilers. I think it's better to focus on the D3D API and its features because it has native compilers on all the different platforms. If someone is interested in doing something in OpenGL, they can use the OpenGL side of the game developer kit. I don't think that the OpenGL side of the game developer kit is as powerful as the D3D side of the game developer kit. From: enigmawolf I have been playing with DirectX and I have decided to focus on DirectX for the remainder of the project. The reason being that I had to learn a lot of different things and I want to focus on just one API. From: yasaku I've been using D3D and SDL for

What are the pros and cons of each, considering security and performance? A: CLI params are sent to the Ironic binary, session token are sent to the user's session. So in essence they are essentially the same. Session tokens are cryptographically secure and stored in the database on the server. They are encrypted using a random key. There is a longer explanation of session tokens in the official docs, but basically, a token is created whenever the user is authenticated. It is a string of some length that represents the token and is stored in the user's session. Ironic CLI parameters are transmitted in plain text over the wire and are susceptible to malicious users. Session tokens are stored securely in a database that cannot be compromised. The role of child abuse and neglect in the development of psychotic symptoms. Child abuse and neglect are significant risk factors for the development of psychotic symptoms. In this study, the prevalence of psychotic symptoms in psychiatrically hospitalized children and adolescents was examined according to a history of child abuse or neglect. Two hundred six children, aged 6 to 18 years, were assessed using the Present State Examination and the Child and Adolescent Symptom Inventory. The prevalence of psychotic symptoms was 14%. Abused or neglected children were significantly more likely to have received a diagnosis of schizophrenia or schizoaffective disorder. This association was not explained by confounding variables or by abuse severity, duration, or consistency. In conclusion, child abuse or neglect was associated with a diagnosis of a psychotic disorder in children and adolescents. Abuse may be a risk factor for a psychotic disorder in adolescence as well as a subtype of the psychosis seen in the pre-school child.Health Benefits of Coconut Oil Coconut oil has been gaining popularity for some time now, and it is also known by different names as well.
