The immunopathology of primary SS is characterized by infiltrating B and T lymphocytes, autoantibodies to SS-A/Ro and SS-B/La, altered secretory function, and epithelial cell death. The breakdown of self-tolerance leading to the in situ activation of autoreactive B and T cells is probably the result of an as yet unknown environmental trigger. The hypothesis that environmental triggers are required to initiate SS is supported by reports of striking parallels with the characteristic autoimmune diseases in many women who developed SS during pregnancy. Pregnancy is also associated with an increased incidence of both SS and SLE. It is apparent that regulatory pathways are active in normal subjects. This is demonstrated by the finding that HLA class II genes are preferentially expressed on the salivary gland in patients who have SS. In SS, the observation of increased expression of the NK-suppressive protein B7-H1 on the salivary gland further supports the concept that disruption of the balance between Th1 and Th2 lymphocyte subsets plays a role in this condition. Although the importance of genetic factors in SS is undisputed, it is likely that environmental factors contribute to development of SS by unmasking or enhancing the immune response in genetically susceptible individuals.
