The world is in danger. What do you choose to do? About This Game: THE STORY With the release of AI War: Fleet Command and over four thousand indie games, we're nearing the end of the line for heroic science fiction. I believe the explosion of sf in games is due to the wokeness of the indie game scene, and not to suddenly stumble on a goldmine of potentials IPs. My goal with this game is to revive the genre through a critical approach, to drag it kicking and screaming out of the century-old fog it was slowly sinking into, and to go beyond today's shallow "setting" issues (species, tech, "humanized" aliens) to the fundamental assumptions of space opera. We've all read enough space opera to know that there are a thousand ways that a space opera can be done right. Yet because the genre has been done to death, and because we lack an alternative, we're never given a chance to see how an experienced writer can run with c9d1549cdd

"In the game, and in cooperation with Rambus, we developed a sound system that provides a smooth, interactive soundtrack experience. To make this possible, we made the decision to use the minimum level of audio. Your job as a player is to fill in some of the missing audio. This is your opportunity to contribute to the atmosphere and visuals of the game and become a part of the history and a landmark in the development of audio for video games". - R.A. Morgan (Director Of Audio) ..... The game is set in the new generation of BattleX, with a realistic approach. The spaceship is located in the middle of the battle field, with the ability to swing weapons while running on the ship's surface or fly directly into the incoming fire. You'll be able to choose from 5 battle ships and 9 weapons, and quickly learn to select the best strategy in a heartbeat. Each victory will affect the final rating, and the better you play the higher the rank. You'll reach different tiers, which will determine how many lives you'll have at the end of the game. IPs article may be of interest to you. ===== mhartl I was actually trying to find a good layman's primer on this topic, before getting sucked into the gory but fun-to-read (and play) details. Thanks. For the first time, engineers have precisely targeted a gene in Drosophila fruit fly embryos and changed the sequence to produce a new protein. They also may have silenced a gene that is involved with a type of cancer in mice; preliminary results from tests in mice have shown that the cancer is more susceptible to the treatment if the gene is not functioning. The work is from two independent groups, that each published its research on Feb. 28 in Science. The project was funded by the German cancer research association and the Ministry of Education and Research, the companion ministries of the European Union. The human genome contains about 20,000 genes, and most of the time these genes are inactive. In some types of cancer, however, the genome's machinery is turned on to produce proteins that aid tumor growth. But many proteins are involved in normal body functions, and scientists don't want them to be produced if the cells are being treated to fight cancer. To prevent this "byproduct" of cancer from being produced, in the first tumor-fighting project the researchers used a virus that targets genes by actually binding to a precise sequence in the genome and destroying the gene when it finds that particular sequence. The researchers called the new kind of antisense molecules "gene drive" after the mechanism of inheritance of the gene. The Drosophila researchers used this method to modify the gene drosophila genes drosophila to produce a protein that they wanted to be inactive in the fly's fruit fly embryos. The project used a pair of gene drive elements, allowing the team to change the sequence of the gene and turn off production of the unwanted protein. In the tumor-fighting work, the scientists used a pair of gene drive elements, but they modified them differently. One of the modifications disabled a cancer-promoting gene called Myc, turning off Myc protein production and causing the fruit flies to be more susceptible to cancer. The other element disabled a gene called Cas9, causing its possible use and production of the Cas9 RNA or protein to be reduced by more than 99 percent. The tumor-fighting fruit flies were treated with drugs that slow growth and
