ra's Lair Virtuxyra's Lair appeared as part of Fossil Recon '17 which is produced in association with the Paleontological Institute of America. The conference is a biannual, multidisciplinary forum for evolutionary researchers to share their passion for Ancient Life. Abstracts are available at: The name Virtuxyra comes from "virtux-" which means "to be of full adult size" and "-yra" which means "to live." The derivation of this phrase was derived from the following partial skeleton with a skull from a cretaceous of western North America. The author's are: Walt Madera (Fig 1), Dwight Patton (Fig 2), Joshua Green (Fig 3), Nicole Dubin (Fig 4), and Dr. Scott Sampson (Fig 5). Virtuxyra's skeleton is described by Tang et al (2014): Named for its robust skull, a large temporal bulge, massive mandible with robust, pedunculated coronoid flanges, and coossicular and dental lines strongly inclined to the vertical, Virtuxyra is a fairly large, truly herbivorous, hadrosaurid from the Late Cretaceous of western North America. Based on juvenile stage characters, the type species, Virtuxyra westonensis is about 4 meters in length and 3 meters in skull length. A substantial temporal bulge projects anteriorly from the vertex, giving a boxy-shaped skull. A broad, oblique, sharp rostral process extends posterodorsally from the skull, separating the frontal and nasal process a posterior portion of the nasal develops an elongate terminal rostral process caudolaterally, and the maxillary produces both metatarsals and several phalanges on distal tarsals.

The hind limb is typical of hadrosaurids. The tibia and fibula are slightly longer than the femur. The astragalus and calcaneum are fused to each other and are slightly curved. The proximal tarsals are fused anteriorly and the distal tarsals are fused laterally to the metatarsals. It is the most derived hadrosaurid in terms of the degree of the fusion of the bones in the pedal unguals. Virtuxyra is
