In the current computing environment, many computing systems are required to have multiple processors sharing computing and/or input/output (I/O) resources that are handled by a single computer. For example, a company in the financial industry may have a computing system that runs a financial trading application. The company is required by governmental regulations to ensure that all transactions are adequately captured. To meet this requirement, the company may have multiple different systems that each must be able to record and store transactions independently from one another. In some instances, the different systems will be located at different sites. In other instances, the systems may be located remotely from one another, or located on the same computing system. The computing systems may also provide a trading application for more than one financial institution. For example, each financial institution may require a trading

It is useful when testing if various sessions are still working as expected. To use this script, you need to create an entry in the registry that specifies which environment variables (program arguments) to check for. It is recommended to use a text file with a plain text editor, and to set the HKEY_LOCAL_MACHINE\Software\Microsoft\Windows NT\CurrentVersion\Winlogon\Parameters key, and specify a value of Name, in the L"RandomText" entry (as shown in the screenshot below). The script supports Windows 7 and 8 as well as Windows Server 2008 and above. The Microsoft CodeVision DCA 2010.3 release adds several new features to CodeVision, including Project Search. With the Project Search add-in, available from you can search for classes, methods, properties and parameters of a particular language easily, even if the project is huge and you need to jump through several levels of nesting. The Project Search consists of three sections. Project Explorer The Project Explorer is the left pane of CodeVision, where you can open and close projects, organize them in a hierarchy, and view details. You can also open and close the Project Explorer pane by pressing the CTRL+ESC keyboard combination. To open a project, select its project name in
