24 hours prior to that, I put an order for a ticket from certain dates only, and I only use the claimed tickets which have less than one day, but I will be avant-garde. But as I was logging in my credentials, I realized that I cannot bypass the confirmation mail (that was sent to the same address from which I purchased the ticket) which is now out of my capacity, thanks to my computer pass case. I. I'm now stuck in the airport while traveling from Chivas to. - anyone out there? I'll start with the easy one, where the update for Android 8.0 "Oreo" rolls out a new property, which is a set of global accessibility APIs called "OrientationAware". This property allows a device to tell Android that it is being used in a way that is different from how it normally is used. Different than how it normally is used? In other words, a keyboard and "natural language" (NLP) capability will be unavailable. (See the apps mentioned below) For example, if the user is seated and looking at a phone. with the "keyboard" showing, it is virtually impossible to use the NLP function, but once it shows up, the user is able to navigate and tap to type. Not exactly intuitive! A number of Android "voice devices" exist, but none of them really have what anyone would call "natural language" ability. All they do is just speak out loud for you. For example, they say, "Hello, this is an employee of the Fotostream company". Google announced the new orientation-aware property last Wednesday and they have had it available in their developer preview for several weeks and is likely to be included in the official Android 8.0 release.. OrientationAware is a new Android API that specifies how Android should behave based on the sensor available to a device, such as its orientation. The API is intended to make sure that a keyboard and natural language features are available when a user intends to use them. A device that has intentionally changed its orientation might have made it impossible for apps that require orientation-aware APIs to work properly. The following apps would be affected: - Google Keyboard (just released in the play store
