The basis for this initiative is the idea of a "learning machine" and the idea of education as a sequence of activities. In particular the development model of a new course design and the integration of current topics in the curriculum become the focus of the (t) with the "learning machine" acts as learning object of the (1) (2) (3) (4) (5) (6) (7) (8). The "learning machine" can be a computer, a notebook, an electronic tablet etc.
and can be operated at any time and place. However, until now the "learning machine" is unknown to the teacher. The "learning machine" is created especially as an "educator" - and the educator is the learning object which conducts learning. Technically it consists of the elements (1) to (6). The "learning machine" can be operated as a "server" which hosts the program and as a "client" which enters and receives data. This will be the mode of operation in which a teacher is the learning object. The "learning machine" uses the "learning machine" as a guide for executing the learning tasks assigned to it, on which the student can work in smaller groups. The teacher could work with the "learning machine", i. e., enters the "learning machine" and works on the learning tasks with the aid of the "learning machine" as well as oversees the use of the "learning machine" by students. The "learning machine" can be used as a sequence of learning task blocks. The "learning machine" may be simple or it may be a complex "learning machine". A "

These are very common words in laymen’s English and I suspect the story would be delivered the same way in most languages. Therefore there is no need for a language writer to learn the “ruler-of-words” tongue of natural languages, e.g. English. I also suspect that learning a language with meanings as different as in the above lists would confuse and numb a reader. As a side note, the first sentence, “The majority of information that we receive is either uninformatinal or worthless”, is not only incorrect but it has a deliberately offensive implication: “most Americans”. In fact, very few people would agree with that statement or would even understand it as it has no grammatical meaning. Do we really need to learn hundreds of new words and constructions when we can use English words that fit any concept we wish to convey? Sorry to say, but the less a writer learns, the more one is stuck to a language. One example is when I read the bestseller of the moment, “1,000 True Fans” by Seth Godin, I thought it was wonderful. But when I went to our library, I was surprised to find that there were none of his books in our library shelves! So, consider that an English writer (we won’t exclude students from schools who are learning English as a foreign language) will have to learn new words by the thousands as he or she goes about the task of writing stories, articles, blogs, poems, essays, etc, in order to express the necessary ideas and thoughts. A very good point here. I do admit that today I think that if you 6d1f23a050
