Black History Month 2018 Mar 1, 2018 This year, in recognition of Black History Month, we celebrate the story of George Washington Carver and the contributions African Americans have made in science and technology. The following article, published in Agriculture Today Magazine, is excerpted from a new book written by Ph.D. candidate Dr. Eriklyn Davis as a tribute to Dr. Carver. In the story of George Washington Carver, we can learn much about Black History. From the age of six, George Washington Carver was fascinated by everything he encountered in nature. He played the piano, studied drawing and painting, composed music and wrote poetry. When he was 14 years old, his family moved to Tuskegee, Alabama, and Carver worked as a farm laborer. He became interested in the farm sciences and studied under a now-famed agriculture teacher named Robert Swinney. At a public library, Carver discovered the writings of Booker T. Washington, an activist who believed in the importance of education for Black Americans. Carver never forgot his teacher's advice. By 1894, as a young man, he moved to Columbus, Georgia, and became a teacher in the state's first vocational school for Blacks. When the school eventually closed, Carver began teaching at a private school. After finishing his college education, Carver turned to agriculture, and in 1910, he received his doctoral degree. Carver described himself as "a Negro scholar, and he identified himself as such." To be a pioneer in agricultural research, many believe Carver would have had to leave school. He told his biographer that he initially came into contact with the idea of "returning to the farm" via his correspondence with Booker T. Washington. Although the two researchers never met, they maintained a friendship over the years. Today, Carver is a household name, but historians are still discovering his discoveries. The earliest recorded mention of his contributions is in the 1914 publication of "Ferdinand Ferdiaud's Dictionary of the Plant World," which included Carver's discovery of groundnut. In 1922, he was introduced to the world of the botanical sciences when he published his first book, "The New Negro: An Interpretation," which
