Of course, that's a close call, but there's a lot of history on their side. It was the UFC's first major fight at a location other than a stadium, and the first at the Wells Fargo Center. And it was the first UFC PPV event held in the area, the first show featuring a large number of local fighters, and it featured a packed house. This was the first all-local headliner in UFC history. In fact, there haven't been many major local shows in the UFC since then. The UFC did fight at various venues like the War Memorial Auditorium and the Steel Valley casino, but it was never truly a fight-crazed place. Even so, the UFC has come close to pulling off other mixed martial arts card sellouts locally. In 2011, there were record crowds of 18,607 and 19,007 at UFCs in Columbus and Indianapolis. I almost never do this, but I'm just going to steal a video that needs to be shared and clicked "Read the rest of the story from today's newspaper." The locker room went ballistic when they heard that the UFC was coming to Pittsburgh. It was clearly an anti-New York mentality: the fight is here and (at the time) we can sell out the place and all the hot celebrities will be here to make it an event. I didn't care that we weren't the UFC. I loved watching the local Pittsburgh fighters, and I loved listening to Jim Norton talk about the events. And when the card did sell out, it wasn't because of UFC -- it was because of the patriotic atmosphere that the locals created. A lot of the people I spoke to said that they were going because they saw the first fight on the regular schedule and it was finally time to see Pittsburgh get some love. There weren't many of those fights, but they happened. And as the UFC expanded, they started to make more and more of these cards. There were events in cities like St. Louis, Anaheim, and Kansas City. But it was in New York, Columbus, and Indianapolis that the UFC felt the most comfortable. People thought that the MMA (and UFC) was going to come to their town. And it helped that a lot of the local promoters were involved with the sport in other aspects. For example, the event in Columbus was the first and only UFC card to feature an all-local broadcast crew. Brinkley was another key local promoter. I believe that the UFC has done more c6a93da74d
