It has been a long time since I have been part of one. After today, though, I will definitely have another go at this. The show is about the feelings surrounding one of the best great accomplishments — whether on a human or machine scale — and it is about the amusing stuff. What's odd about it is that you don't always know you did a good job unless you have someone to tell you. Working together, we did a lot of good, but we also learned a lot about our communication skills and creativity.

A search term "digital painting" would reveal something like this. If you get any of Photoshop, Lightroom, or any other Adobe application, the free version is a pre-requisite to fully owning the product. However, sometimes you need to supplement it with some useful functions. As far as I know, every Adobe application has some form of an advanced mode, where you can tweak and experiment by testing different options in order to thoroughly explore and create the best possible image. As a developer of Ruby on Rails, I have been bitten by the idea of what is known as the MVP (Minimum Viable Product) problem on several occasions. I must admit the problem is not something I feel terribly strongly about, even though it is a crucial part of the development process in the software industry. The point is that software development is something that will never end, and sometimes the simplest and easiest approach is not always the right one. That is when you need to push through the frontiers of your idea.
